

The consequence

Guests feel it first

Slow responses, forgotten preferences, a room that wasn't ready. Not dramatic failures — small gaps that add up to an experience that feels careless.

Staff carry the weight

Constant context-switching, filling gaps the systems should fill, and absorbing the stress when something falls through. High cognitive load, high turnover, and less time for the interactions that actually matter.

Business pays for it

Every coordination failure has a cost — in comped rooms, repeated work, manager time pulled into small emergencies, and guests who don't come back. None of it shows up on a single dashboard, but it compounds daily.
